

You are very disciplined. Very noticeable. I have a general subject I thought I might share with you this time.

You were talking recently about creation and how everyone is creative to some greater or lesser extent. Well, I want to confirm something else about creativity, and yes, I am aware you read something along these lines in the book you are reading at this time. But let me reiterate a few points please.

Everyone is creative. The process of thought is to create. You create a thought, therefore you are creative.

Even if the thought was not of the purest, you have still created the thought. It cannot be uncreated.

As you may be aware, it takes energy to create a thought. One particle of energy from your body's source and is altered to form the thought you create.

I have a question for you, which I confess I do not know the answer to. If energy cannot be destroyed, only dissipated into another form, such as that of a thought, does that mean that all your thoughts ever from your mind continue to exist somewhere in our ether?

No, I don't know the answer, that would be for someone on a higher pay grade, to coin a phrase we often use here in jest.

A few of us have philosophized over this question several times. We've poked what we know about our biology of this life and have so far decided on one practical answer.

We have never heard of anyone's previous thoughts from either their life on earth, or here in our place, being called upon as a reference.

It might be that there is some enormous facility that keeps them, for higher beings to reference, but honestly we agree that that would be highly unlikely.

When we 'create' our thoughts, they are very much a creation of the individual. Unless we specifically require someone else to "hear" them, they simply dissipate away.

We have concluded as a group that the myth of thoughts remaining forever in the ether as one created by humans on earth, often with a tamped belief of somehow making someone else change or limit their thoughts. Your churches and religions are often the worst culprits, particularly your own spiritualist organisation.

The myth I mentioned earlier about energy not being destroyed is also very much a misunderstood notion that humans hold onto. It is not true. Energy does not always remain in any state of body. Come on humans, wake up to the real facts.

I want you to understand that a thought is a creative process that requires energy. But once the thought is complete, it fades away, in our understanding.

Thoughts can be transferred mind to mind though, as we can do at ease. You know this as telepathy. But as far as we have discovered, the actual thought, and therefore the energy used to create it, disappear as does the energy of a torch used to create a light. Once the light has shone, it has gone.

I wanted to show this with you in the hope that you would rest assured that your thoughts on earth are just that, your thoughts. Unless you direct them specifically at a realm of intelligence, such as that of the Divine force, God, the thought is lost forever. Do you honestly believe your brain is capable of holding every single creative thought you have ever made? That would need some brain power!

I'll leave that with you, to mull over. Remember, I've only shared an opinion
from most of us this side.
We've studied this dilemma and have found no supporting evidence, and believe me,
we have more resources
at hand than you do on earth.

I knew my topic would pounce to your mind!

Thank you for this opportunity.

Goodbye
Paul!
