Of all the senses that humans are born with, the least one used may surprise you - it is the one of sight. Yes, humans do use them to see, but more often than not, its to see what they want to see and not the entire picture available to them -

During their lives on earth, those that are blessed with eyesight use them less and less as they age. A child notices everything and this is often evident in the child's reactions. But as a being grows older with more knowledge about their surroundings and a stronger sense of awareness, they use their actual eyes less, instead allowing their own brains to fill in the missing information. Of course, for the normal person thus human created retribution offers no general problems - But it does mean that a person is not as observant as they could be. Think back in your own day just passed, how much did you observe today. Let me help you out with the answer. You only observed about one half of what your eyes presented to you. You dismissed things that you weren't focused on, or weren't important enough to get your attention. That man yesterday you had to day to replace the broken window, did you notice the scar on his hand? Did you observe what shoes he was wearing? I suspect you can't recall even the colour of his shirt and trousers! You only observed what you wanted to see - enough for that period.

We appreciate it would be pretty difficult to be observing everything you see at every moment your eyes were open. You'd be walking around googled eyes! And your brain would be working in hyperdrive all the time. But the point we're making is that you, and all humans on earth, are selecting what they want to see based on the circumstances of that moment.

There is so much more that passes you by every day unnoticed or unobserved.

It would be good for your unfoldment if you made more effort at times to truly experience the details of the picture. Highlight your vision by making an asserted effort to see more.

It's a clever technique to slowing time down too. Perhaps not in alignment with your fixed linear time frame, but instead in your personal movement through time.

We know that you have often used the story of how US spirit people might well be amongst you all in plain sight at times and unless you were around physically touching everyone, you'd never really know. But this story highlights our point to you this evening. If you want to see something that is unusual, something that might be a sign of message from us, then you have to make a conscious effort to acknowledge everything your eyes are seeing, rather than just the basic information that you expect at that moment.

Here in our world we have much better vision than we're blessed with. Our minds can process more information faster. Often we see things before they've actually happened too. But that's probably going to confuse you!

What we're suggesting demands no special skills or anything more than those you already have. But use them with

More purpose and a sense of awareness and you will be welcoming more information, and more detail about and from your world and ours.

Don't put boundaries on your vision, instead learn to stretch the abilities of your eyes. Seeing beyond your spectrum is entirely possible. It takes practice and commitment.

I hope what 'opened your eyes' with our words today. See how you get on tomorrow. Sleep soundly friend.
