

You remind me of a typewriter
I once owned on earth.

I was a secretary and was so fortunate to have one of the first ever in the office where I worked. I treasured that machine. I used to call it Bessy. I treated it with care and everyone was always telling me
it was an inanimate object. But I still greeted it every morning and said goodbye Bessie every night.

When I was told I could come through to you this night, I was delighted. I'm using you, like I used Jessie, to create my needs. Isn't that progress, don't you think?

That is the way of the world, progress. It can be seen in every aspect of life.

Things start from little seeds and become bigger treasures for the world.

I'm not overly familiar with the gadget you're using to write with, but I do like the idea. I could have used that

Every day for taking my Spalding notes.

I worked in a large insurance company as what was called head staff of the pool. I had responsibilities to teach others that wanted to progress their typing abilities. I never let any of them use Bessy though.

I used to marvel at the individual projects
I used to see.
We even had electrically in a few of our rooms at home. I remember when the telephone started to become popular. We thought there was magic work. We never could afford one at home though.

Yes, over the years I spent on earth I seen so many devices, as you call them, come into the world.

Over time, my early years seemed so old fashioned as all the mechanical wonders come to be.

Nothing stands still. There is no such state. Everything is in a state of progress. As you live, you do so in that state of progress. It is around you and within you. Yes, you too need to progress.

You have a saying about living with the times. That is so true. If you don't, you'll be left behind, and thus you will always be chasing everything.

The only time programs would ever stop is if time did too. But no that's not possible in your world, then medicine with time even answers, is how life should be.

Progress is not limited to your world though. Everywhere and everything is in a state of progress. Every one on earth, and every living soul in any world is progressing. I nearly called you bossy then. Sorry.

have enjoyed this opportunity to share my few thoughts with you, and those people that will read them. It is indeed such a joy I do hope that all of you enjoy your process and remain prepared to change and adapt.

Goodbye. If you need Bessy, I'd be pulling your corner as how.
Tattie Bye.
