

Hello,

The storms on the horizon offer warnings of impending weather changes. The colour and density of the clouds in the sky. The noises around you, such as the sounds of the songs from the birds and animals. The quantity of traffic on the roads within your earshot.

The sound of church bells or rainfall on the window. The sounds from footsteps or from workers busy with their tasks.

Even in the midst of darkness the air is filled with information for your senses to digest.

I could go on for many more minutes describing your environments and your opportunities to heighten your senses.

But people have created this habit of ignoring so much of their surroundings, instead relying on just that that appears important to their needs at that time. Is it hardly any wonder that so much is MISSING from their daily lives.

You are a sensitive, as are those that have chosen your path through life.

When you chose this way, had you realised that much of the information you might need was around you and available all the time?

When you wake up, what information could tell you what day of the week it was? Why is this important? Because learning to appreciate your surroundings and the information that it gives increased your opportunities to observe and even detect sensations that are out of place.

When people this side of their life want to send a message to those on earth requiring it, they use what is available more often than not. But the communication often doesn't reach its intended person because they are unaware of that around them. They are only hearing or seeing, or sensing that what suits their needs at that moment. If they left space for more information, they would awaken their senses to a richer world where information and communication would flow freely.

Sometimes people that want to improve their communications with our world are trying to do so with only a fraction of their senses being used.

Ask yourself why some people can see auras while others can't. Why some can hear the voices in their mind and others don't. Why some only forward half of a communication while others relay more details.

Part of that hidden or missing ability is due to their lack of focus on the information.

around them.

May I address your reader for a moment?

Stop reading this, and sit for a moment where you are. If there is a window, look through it. What do you see that you've never seen before. What sounds can you hear that you've never realised were there. What odours are around you. Now, what words would your nearest and dearest in our world want to say to you this moment?

Hear their voice as you remember it to be.

See them dressed as they were. Make space in that room for them.

Is there a chair they could sit on with you now? Then invite them to. But use all your senses - you're going to need them.

Don't just rely on your gut instinct, or intuition, sense them.

Truly sense them. If you invited them to come, then they will. It may only be for a fleeting moment, but they will be there.

Tomorrow brings a new day for you. Use it and get more from it. Observe like you've never done before. Take everything in and realise the richness of your word. Appreciate that in doing this, you are like the carpenter sharpening his tools.

The sharper the tool, the better the job.

Thank you for relaying
my thoughts friend.

Goodbye.
